New Invention Can Be Used in Telephones

The Transistor—the name for a new device that will serve as an amplifier or an oscillator and perform nearly all the functions of an ordinary vacuum tube—has been demonstrated at the Bell Telephone Laboratories in New York, it is announced by A. B. Smith, local manager of the Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company.

The Transistor has been used to amplify the electrical speech waves traveling between two telephones, a function now performed by vacuum tubes, Smith said. It works on an entirely new physical principle discovered by the laboratories.

The Transistor answers a question scientists have been pondering for many years—how to provide a simpler, more rugged, smaller device that could perform the functions of a vacuum tube. Less than a tenth of the power used by an ordinary flashlight bulb runs it.
